While the fate of the majority of the 2,100 persons on board the mammoth White Star liner Titanic, which sank early yesterday on the Newfoundland Banks after a collision with an iceberg, still remains in doubt, and it is feared more than 1,200 persons were lost, a note of good cheer came from the ocean ways by wireless between 1 and 2 o'clock this morning.

It was in the shape of a wireless message from the White Star liner Olympic, one of the vessels hovering near the scene of the disaster, flashing the news that 866 of the Titanic's passengers, mostly women and children, were being brought to port by the Cunarder Carpathia. Other messages later brought confirmatory tidings.

First reports were that the Carpathia had saved but 670 persons. The new figures reduced the list of those for whose fate fear was felt by nearly 200, and if, as seems probable, practically all those saved were passengers, it would appear that all but approximately 450 of the vessel's passengers are accounted for. A partial list of the survivors received from the Carpathia includes the names of many women of prominence who were on the steamer.

After the first desperate calls of the Titanic for help had been sent flying through space and brought steamers for hundreds of miles around speeding to the scene, what seems to have been an impenetrable wall of silence was raised between her and the anxious world. The giant liner, so far as last night's advices appear, went to her fate without so much as a whisper of what must have been the scene.

In the lack of even a line from a survivor, imagination pauses before even trying to conjecture what passed as the inevitable became known, and it was seen that of the more than 2,000 human lives with which she was freighted there could be no hope of saving, as it appears, far less than a half.
